

Feathered Love lives in our days a different darkness in the thicket of our habits, the disguises we believe and cohabit from day to sunny day. This Love has built a cave in us in forest dense, so leafy, green we believe it free of prior human knowledge, the City of Fulfilled Desire we were told as children to expect.
But spread out across its streets we find its contradiction, light that has no warmth and frothing acid mists that kiss each shrivelled leaf with rust beneath which crowds of silent strangers vent their rage on everything; each passing day presents a constant threat of winter empty thickets fill with sparrows and beneath their feathered shelter we cohabit in the darkness of the cave.

Dark ships in the distance and the search for home which is no home, is eternally unfamiliar, home of hidden enemies and dragons.

In the old times

there was forest and meadow, hearth and home. Nothing grew or flew beyond the range of heart or hawk. But now these dark ships come and go and heavens, oceans, lap this foreign shore that is my home where each familiar thing is further exile. I have sung, and harped, and held my tongue.

I have beaten on the earth with mind and body. Yet every thing comes down to distances and ships. And they go nowhere.

A lousy bargain I was given Tristram sad in exile in return for an eternal love.

Sadness takes the comfort from home no love is possible to have and hold without home. Taken from me, given in return this eternal return

looking for you where no love can thrive. This is the first forest

I lost you in.

Love blossomed and within the petals blossomed death, the upland meadow by the sea let go its sturdy flowers, wild and simple and in my heart they undermined my hearth and home.
You came from their midst sought first to heal my wounds then in anger sought to kill.
And from the gathering of you and flowers no one else will ever know came a storm, a love where neither rage nor mercy had a place.
It broke into the world and took us both.

Wake up staring as if a dream, or nightmare

Rain in the forest, all things cold and wet, May

This isn't supposed to happen.
Damn the defences memory makes against the present even those of the Beloved against the rude love I bring to this cave in the woods, my armour creaking with rust, intact.

In a dream I see the threat that brought me to this forest finally brings me to leave. So I go in and I go out again now in white armour, now in black riding a horse, or on foot and in rags.

Do you remember the tin woodsman?
He had no heart at all, looked everywhere to find one because the source and the sustenance of feeling is always external, beyond the immediate body, thru which I recognize a growth of feeling, not just do you love me, can you prove it but rather, loving you, in sadness, loss of heart. Yes Ladylove, the forest.

The forest.

In the forest there was no one else to talk to but you. Often you seemed yet another dragon, out to devour life, love, forest and I to you was often just a beast that strayed into your private meadow.
So now we live alone, unable to avoid these fears that dragons, beasts are part of life and love of you and me.

I could run wild and crazy all thru the forest for love of you and have. Now I'm getting old and savage and let's see

are you fair are your hands slim and white?

Ah yes
I'm getting old and savage with remembering the tangled paths of forest where such distinctions harbour dragons

and the memory
of you.

Tristram is destined for sadness, sadness in love, sadness at each birth, the death of the Beloved, each love born in sadness.
I'm getting deadtired of births and rebirths. Can't I be done being born, done with childhood.

Someone else is always king: fathers, brothers, husbands, even long lost lovers. All I do is go on slaying dragons, ride by the lake around my sad sad heart this stupid always reborn armour.

Why can't I have what I want. Why can't I be around you always.

Despite the sadness of my birth I want to give my arms to you, that land and body surrendered to the joy

of you.

Fealty I swore to the King my body & my land I gave fealty to the goodness & cheer of Arthur's honest knights fealty I swore to the mystery of Love's unearthly Light & fealty now & almost always to you.

Faith I broke with King & land seldom do I ride in company of my chosen brethren & Love's ways are a great & marvellous bitterness.

Yet to you I look with the eyes of a child my Wife, my Queen my Sister my

Necessity is all of our mothers finally. There is a certain comfort in her, rebukes your passivity & my rage & my passivity & your rage — our daemonic passions common as dust & motherlust.
She invented us, brings us corruption. & now she will desert me in your form

The forest magic does not forbear the shadows of the city

Each glade and leafy path becomes a city street, a parking lot and fears are neither foreign nor absurd. Whatever else we have

I am no king and never will be. His

venal rage is all around us with His guile

I bow before the honor of His person while before his loveless power this and every other forest burns.

These fears can teach us nothing.

I wake up sweating from our dream to find His sword between us where I'd placed my own.

Dragons of Life and Death are born and nest

in the things we say and do.
Thirty years is a long time to love.

I will love you more than thirty years.

What evil has been done to me I forget, but then I forget much that was goodness. Sorrows, moss, remembered pain in the crotches of these blossoming trees.

Yet I am neither hawk nor sparrow and when the thousand sparrows mass and swarm a single tree I have nothing to sing, nothing to do with Life or Death.

Only the tree knows the weight of sparrows and of hawks, and of dragons and the things we say and do.

I had great joy of you. Had great joy of you alone, those lovely lonely days alone in the cave with you each morning sitting by the doorstep in the sun, our walks in the forest far from everyone. There was nothing and no one but you. And now I think if only all of it could be true great joy. But alone. And I am.

Three windows of the Crystal Cave are Kindness, Humility, Breeding.

The light of enchantment is sweet by which I read the cheap mysteries left behind by others, stories of kindness stories of humility. So we aren't the first to come here we won't be the last. The stories tell me of how easily kindness and humility run from the threat of pesticides and from the ravages of wild beasts and strangers.

I turn over on the cold slab to touch you, bored with mysteries but the third window is gone.

Love's Cave is green crystal, brilliant bottlegreen light around us, green forest beyond, and beyond the pale green sea. Yet our lovemaking merely drove us crazy our groans and cries brought back the great beasts from the age of magic.

But we were fearful of their heavy passage and slaughtered most — the magic potion overturned as madness, meant for another time the primal lovers long departed before this mortal drunkenness began before the practical problems of meat and drink, and how to live in caves.

In the real forest I've heard only the sound of your heart quickening, no belching dragons, no clatter of weapons running my tongue along your blood blossoming labia. Nothing in the forest compelled me like your sweetness like no other in my life no other such complex symmetry. Last night's so recent memory of bottlegreen light, dazzling crystalline foliage opening into the dark of your pink black muscle of pleasure blossoming light as pure as it can be, neon streets and the endless arguments of living subdued by the light from the cave in the dark of it uplifted in my hands, moving mouth on mouth

into the sweetscented lover's kiss.

Only a fool believes a single fire can burn down a whole forest.

Yet in the face of ordinary logic, love is a torch in the hand of a pyromaniac. Or is it ordinary logic in the face of love.

Between these, ordinary lovers hold hands and build small fires to keep their love alive believing in small fires and the existence of the whole forest.

In the face of which despite love and logic

it begins to rain.

If this is a Magic Forest why is it raining? Love this passion isn't magical, isn't even fair. We can't go on with our ordinary lives and now we have to stay inside this stupid cave just to stay out of the rain.

Why don't Angels protect us? Where are the police?

The only thing I can see in abundance is the rain, which keeps coming and coming, spreading mud and moss across the marble floors.

Companionship at night, peaceful waking in the morning's light, but now

I know too much about you to fool myself with dumb delight at what you say. Your form is changed the smallness and the hard animal muscles along your back and thighs are new and these are the things I want to have and hold as if holding you will deny the pain of your desertion.

I'm not fooled by anything that doesn't consummate our ancient story and my return to the forest the streets

the other light

Out in the harbour steel boats of trade and commerce unload their slime and goodness from Eurasia more wires and oilsucking junk to mob our days with false reports of capital gains and news of trips to nowhere. I grow sick of listening sick to death with talk of ships of how we came to ground amidst them how that wondrous thirst came upon us how we drank up all the city's blossoms how I touched your body after months of waiting. Great steel boats are rusting in the harbour the wires and junk flower in a hundred thousand bodies just like ours. I am sick of blossoms, sick of memory, sick of this thirst for you that steers me far from thought of human commerce, far from what the harbour really has to say of how the city truly flowers.

June comes following May may June be followed by more and more of you.

I can't get enough of you each week, month, getting enough gets more like the struggle for simple sustenance. Each day

I see more in you, more to you than I ever dreamed as a younger man.

But younger men see nothing, drink poison willingly.

Freud believed there are witches in the cave.
Sixty years later, despite the evil common traffic of bodies and souls, I've seen no witches, rather pain and plenty, and as the seasons pass I see a green light turn to red, and back to green.

You weren't supposed to love two of us, but you do. That isn't in the story.

These days you have to love yourself most understand the limits to the forest & the story as a play upon our lives. Not words but that our love is alive & these words may or may not outlive it.

Even if the story will.

two men.

That isn't the story. But you do and despite the confusion it creates, the story is still true.

Oh well.

I'm no good at my job either — most of those dragons defeat me.

But I do want to love you well — I want you to love me and to live with me in splendour.

Even if we have to kill the king.

That isn't in the story either, but outrageous measures are needed, death is the end of both love and confusion and the story.

It's been so long I can't remember why sleeping with you was so great

I would spurn everything alert and alive for the touch of your sleeping hand. Love, what was it? It's been nearly a week.

The green crystal light is a blue fog, Diana Ross on the FM sounds like the end of the world. Maybe I killed all those dragons for you for nothing, just heat inside my helmet. Maybe there were no dragons, no castles not even windmills. Just women and men, men and women and infant dreams of pure crystal.

Love stories grow into stories of endurance. True love endures & so the story told right lasts forever, is repeated by a few bright lives & defeated by many more in the dark.

There are wolves gathering in the meadow and beyond the ridge of the wooded vale missile silos threaten the coming day.

This world has grown old, old & bitter from enduring the failure of human desire. I turn to you for comfort in the barest light of the new moon to tell you all I know of love & of endurance. But often you're a brightness I can't bear the glare of or you are gone.

You're someone else's wife, wife of no one. Along the way

I've forgotten who it is I am to love, who I am to myself gets lost in where and who I've been to others.

And who are you? I've lost all memory of where it was this secret ecstasy was born and why we fled into this forest grows more transparent and defenseless every day. I read somewhere we've come to find the mother in the woman father in the man, and the meeting place of all those things together in the sun.

Instead it's wife and husband and unexpected terrors seep from our desire: for me that no one will ever know me for you that I am no one.

The exact formality of this forest light locks us forever in the memory of delight which prevents the darkening thought of who we are, & how, & what are the proper contents of a human life where do we live

& how. How can I stay with you without thought of the surrounding world that to our love is dark locked up so formally in the memory of delight.

Aw,
it isn't old age or the clammy dullness of a particularly lousy winter's day.

It's the times, & the single moment of drink I wasn't even deceived in the taking of. True love blossomed like the memory of childhood & I drank it in as a newborn babe takes its first breath. & now the times send me about these streets looking for not love but the cause & source of memory's delight.

Now you are gone and memory fails me, anger grows into darkness draws from each and every thing its light and colour. All substance fades without your presence even pain and pleasure are forgotten.
I am trying to remember you, your hands your arms your shoulders your breasts your stomach your body hair your buttocks your labia your thighs your calves your ankles your feet the soles of your feet on my shoulders your cries your whimpers your shudders your smell your lips your eyes your forehead your hair your neck your darkness your love your absence.

I've forgotten nothing particular of where and in what I've sought and found love.

There is no Goddess of the Corn.
There are no tractors that can plough and plant this meadow. Just imaginary powers, dreams of peace and our unending waste of time and heart.
As if our lives were endless in their acts.

But looking out across the barren meadow there is little we can show, our meagre energies are wasted, our stories untold or mistold or pointless, as if we alone were there as if there is no Goddess of the Corn no endless lines of waiting tractors, as if there are only endless acts of love, and the particular hulks and wrecks that rise up like statues to imaginary powers and our unending waste of time and heart.

Objecting to the quality of the love you give me is like complaining about the weather in the middle of a blizzard.

On the sunny days we've spent together, Beloved,

I was the King of all I could see. The sky the limit. And in the flight it gave me I forgot about the winter ice and snow the sparrow that starves thru each succeeding storm living off pine cones and crumbs, complaining to coyotes of the weather and of the quality of love.

God damn that silly bravado gets me thru these ambushes.

I give it up to loving you & I give up what caused you to love me in the first place. I knew no one in the way I know you, & now

I can know no one else without the fear of an ambush & you.

Does desire remain immediate, or does it like the heart grow cold and skillful in returning to the source of its most hidden dark delight like some once-wild beast made tame by satiety and pleasure or by drugs it doesn't see or fight.
How lonely and fated it is, how far from the mysterious clean bodies bright with other possibilities since I drank of you I can never quite get it up for.
In the heart of this forest we devised a strange loneliness breeds without desire for the wildflowers growing in the meadow beyond its sight

In the Hall of Statues there was one resembled you but she was cold, unmoving like the world before you came & you constructed me & I constructed you of flesh & blood & flowers at last made real. But here the bird I made to sit upon the slender female arm I made won't fly, won't leave the nest of flesh & blood you are made out of time & memory gone bad from sitting in the heart too long alone for fear of flesh & blood made real, and cold.

On this dreary winter's morning I dream of your return and then awaken to a snowy winter's morning alone. Good Morning

Heartache, good is the most rare of love's few sane accomplishments.

Acts of dream or acts of will mean nothing to the wind today, it stirs the cold white mantle on the meadow where once the blossoms softly . . .

Despite the dream, the acts of will that never quite succeed, despite this dreary winter's morning

I think of blossoms and what they are and do, and put an end to heartache and to goodness.

Doing penance for a liberty I can't use, for the absence of things worth doing and for human love struck down by life sucking daemons even if they don't have licences drive us to and fro and sometimes crazy. Does anyone out there know what I'm saying?
Save me?
No.
Help me make it thru the night? The night is a pleasant place, rather there is an emptiness to this liberty like being unemployed in a general crisis. Every thing is done wrong, or done to pleasure someone else not myself or my Beloved and nothing tells us what it is, and what it does to us. The struggle these days is to care at all, will go on for thirty more years grows too difficult to continue to ignore.

Do I Love You, asks Nina Simone on the record player, moaning for the fiftieth time this week now it's true she does love you and in the next cut destroys the illusion by saying

Baby, get lost.
And I ask you

who listens to those lyrics but a few fools

looking for the perfect symmetry of emotion once found is denied by the next perfect symmetry. The Perfect Emotion is like the Perfect Poem no stable vocabulary or subject just language and a vague melody you and I know all too well as do the dragon-builders and the flowers in the meadow.

Oh sure, personal idiosyncrasy & the complex network of nerve & absence of nerve, genetically reprogrammed all in order to wake up terrified at the possibility of proper care & attention to the tender rituals of love. I thought “tendrils” & of my love of vines & felt the entanglement of fear & desire choking out the things we are or might yet be.

Tristram, tired of desire, desired to go home. But there was no home to go home to, his mother a mossy stone in the meadow the castles destroyed or imaginary the forests burned & his people dispersed by famine & greed.

Not a single familiarity left for the sake of memory. For the sake of himself & desire

he didn't go home.

Times of plenty times of woe, as if every pleasure isn't enough.

I tell you over and over I love you love you, you woman I adore as no man will adore you and you're asleep, having your period, grumpy at the absence of meaningful work and the nights are too damned hot for comfort and I'm burning up with lust for you long past midnight as if our lives weren't separate aren't falling away from the other nearly as fast as we draw them halfheartedly together. As if we know every pleasure isn't enough. Times of plenty times

of woe.

The Course of True Love leads to sadness, uncovers rage that makes the springtime blossoms drop from the trees, & the trees bear fruit that wouldn't tempt a pig.
Were it not for the products of True Love's Course I would beg you to live with me in plain sight of the bad eyesight of pigs & men & women in pain.

The Crystal Cave is after all imaginary, after all we've done to make of it a fortress for our love or is it loneliness and therefore why we are so hungry all the time, so locked in by the events of love everything else storms against. If god is love god damn the bits of broken glass the weather washes back and forth along the city streets I walk each night alone inside the Crystal Cave.

Crystal
is too fragile
for the crisis we face.
Each crystal of the cave is unique, is as permanent as snowflakes are unique, recurrent.
I have no idea why I love you as I do, as if there would be no life possible without you, as there will certainly be life without you.

Alas the brief day of our love

long the endless nights now you are gone. And so on and so forth, also endlessly. Go thru the formalities

I tell myself, it isn't you but The Return is endless.

There will be others, many others to grace my lust and life only

I don't believe a word I say.
I fear the brief day and The Return which now returns uneasily, or not at all you haven't really left. So pay no mind to the returns you get and less to those of mine. Mere formalities. Like this formality is only to admit to you who cannot know and may not care

I wake up in the night covered with sweat and the formality of your absence.

Each leafy kingdom falls, and all

that's ever settled is I love you and that there isn't heart enough for love and duty both.

Alas, my Lady. Such ancient words. They are like dragons on these streets where people talk of little but the drugs and drink that empty words or join the roaring clamour in the alley or the nightwinds blow and lost dogs whimper in the dark.

Leafy kingdoms
sodden in the rain or stripped and ragged from the crawling insect day where summer strokes the meadow with its ancient breath and time is torment or love's death.

Still forest, leafy glade, and something tells us desire is near, is questing always has and there is nothing you or I or anyone can do.

It brushes past us, stinking, sweating howling all at once like forty hounds in heat the Magic Questing Beast of Yore.

I curse the Questing Beast.
I call a halt to such excesses curse the forest curse the Cave of Love itself.

I'm tired of that which makes a world of only lust and love and separates intelligence from both.

*Still forest, leafy glade.
Desire afoot and we but sweating messengers of what will not be held or made to work an honest day*

Time on time I've heard the eerie shrieks and whistles in the woods felt every instinct reach for it as music to the savage breast.

I've traced its scent to oilslicks on the lake my heart has made by damming up the things I've heard and things I've done or chosen not to do.

I've seen the broken moments fall until the hulks begin to dot the meadow as much a part of it as flowers are in spring.

*Still forest, leafy glade.
The Questing Beast is my delight turned to mechanics, leads to nothing, touches nothing.*

I can't find you in it, can't find anything of warmth and sustenance wake up in these cities of mechanical desire.

No forest, leafy glade. You have vanished and I am left with a Questing Beast and junk that overwhelms the memory of delight and of the wildflowers and the meadow.

Enchantment that lasts an entire lifetime is one thing, turns the world into a single blessed excruciating obsession.

But if it lasts only two years, three the hangover is unbearable, the victims become saints & madmen in tales told by old men & women with bitter hearts.

So you tell me it's over, the enchantment a memory half pain, half pleasant walks on the beach feeling lonely & good about how much pleasure it all was. Nothing anyone can make of the tyrant king, Duty calls like the braying of donkeys, Vogue magazines lie open on the table between phonecalls from friends & clients, white wine from France, dinner parties, trips to the islands with new & pointless lovers.

& I can't shake off the hangover, nor the fatal pride that demanded a life-long enchantment when all there was to it was two human beings in the opacity of a world where no magic can be believed drunk with smelling & touching one another & the great beasts of an ancient story where human paradise & possibility are a forest, a city, a drinking in of the other against the countless dragons of everything else.

Axes in the forest, then chainsaws, and the woodcutters falling trees into the lake. They always find us and ask questions.

Who are you? And Why did you come here? Dante's dark lake or Heidegger's path of the woodcutter. Each is a clearing grown questionable.

One leads to a singular willful being and the other is the darkness

ancestors rise within to feed upon our pleasure and drift away disappointed at its mortality.

We all seek light and so what? The lake is thoroughly polluted and the chopping goes on unabated. Chop, chop.

Chop, chop, chop, chop, chop.
Better to find a way requiring neither drowning nor this stupid lumbering.

Some harvest of light and goodness together, and a decent city that will last for years in the dark forest.

TRISTRAM

sad at the impossibility of satisfactory love finally admitted. Like loving a dragon — too many spines too much foul air, slime in the bed with the precious gems. After years and what seem years and years of relative hardship

what did he drink? What were those wildflowers?

Did he drink anything but a good vintage wine that cost three times what it should have?

There is no triangle, no trinity no threefold goddess just a goodness

that is three times the agony of its functional value. The dragon he woke up to.

But One Tristram, One Isolde

Each thing truly known reveals a dark, each loving moment truly asked for finds its beam of light resolved in treachery. Ah, Isolde, Isolde across the variant ocean grey as office buildings in the dead of winter the dull mechanics turn their wrenches back and forth across desire and purity alike and neither of them dies nor moves the vast enameled suckers from our poisoned wounds that vomit sadness which bespoils the blossoms.

Instead of time, that washing over time completes it, a tide of bodies, eager lovers, passing vagrants, drunks the dragon eats. Enough of featherbedding talk.

A new desire grows disrespectful of the difficulty, rolls and tumbles all my halfborn sadness in the laughter of my children growing up within the sunny days I make that growing bold and certain with their streaming flowers ferment with simple memories of pleasure and of goodness.
Ah, Isolde, Isolde,

There is no constancy, no memory upheld except by what can turn the dark to truly know and ask again.

I have cared for others, I was touched by others, more than one has held me, yet another cured me, yet another holds me in the crystal light.

I was a sparrow and a falcon.
I am a songbird in the end.

I see that each thing truly known and asked for drinks in the crystal fragments, but one Tristram, one Isolde.
